Marking World Cancer Day at Arrowe Park Hospital

World Cancer Day is an important opportunity to pause, reflect and raise awareness about cancer, its impact, and the vital importance of early diagnosis, access to information and compassionate support.

It is also a chance to recognise the experiences of patients, families and colleagues affected by cancer, and to highlight the role we all play in supporting better outcomes.

To mark World Cancer Day, our Macmillan Team held a stall at the front entrance of Arrowe Park Hospital, welcoming patients, staff and visitors. The team offered practical advice, signposting, and education, as well as a listening ear for anyone who wanted to talk or learn more about cancer support services.

The stall helped raise awareness of the wide range of support available through Macmillan, including emotional, practical and financial guidance, and reinforced the message that no one needs to face cancer alone.

Pictured is Rosemary Roberts, Macmillan Information and Support Advisor, who alongside colleagues continues to provide invaluable support to people affected by cancer across our Trust.

Thank you to the Macmillan Team for their dedication and for taking the time to recognise the importance of World Cancer Day, not just yesterday, but through their work all year round.
